The old train stood at the platform as three young brothers prepared for their journey. Each sat atop a brown suitcase with an identification tag around their neck made from paper and string. They all wore their best coats (which were far too big for them) and their smart, brown boots. Their concern and anxious thoughts were clear from their faces as they huddled together to comfort one another.

The statue – once copper, now turquoise-green with age – stands towering in front of the city skyline at sunset. The statue of a woman wearing robes is revered around the world. In her left hand, she holds a book and in her right hand, she holds a flaming torch above her head. Her head, adorned with a spiky crown, looks out over the ocean as millions of people arrive at the shore each year.
